Learning Objectives

- Identify key factors that were involved in legal cases that questioned the assessment of threats of violence done by school personnel.
- Learn the lessons from several legal cases after student suicides pertaining to parent notification and the suicide assessment conducted at school and whether when a student is 18 years or older parent notification is or is not required.
- Understand the complex relationship between bullying and suicide and the outcome of numerous lawsuits filed against schools after students died by suicide and parents were critical of the schools' role in preventing bullying.
- Understand best postvention practices in schools after a suicide in light of a lawsuit filed against a school district by parents after the second suicide of their children.
- Become familiar with a lawsuit brought against school personnel for failure to notify parents of a student who engaged in NSSI.

Workshop Description

The incidence of threats of violence and suicide requires that schools have well trained threat assessment teams. Many questions have been raised about the ethical and legal responsibilities for school psychologists in threat assessment. The presenter has been an expert witness in more than a dozen cases where schools were sued after a tragedy and will share the outcome of those cases and the lessons learned for prevention and intervention. Several of those cases questioned the competency of the suicide and/or violent assessment done by school personnel. Practical best practices for school psychologists in conducting thorough assessments of threats and how to avoid liability will be outlined.
